

I don't think the FCC should do anything that will weaken the Indiana law for Telephone Privacy. Since this law has been into effect I have received few calls than I did before. I was getting 20 to 30 calls aweek and most of them during the time that I spend enjoying my family and at the evening meal hour. I now receive at 5 to 10 calls aweek that still interrupt me while I'm trying to do something else.

I think it should be against the law for someone to make money from selling your phone number on a list for the purpose of druming up busniess. I pay for the use of this number and someone can make money off of it by selling it on a list to telemarketers. This sure is an invasion of my privacy and making money from something that I receive a bill for every month.

It seems that the only thing that the lawmakers think about is keeping the big companies happy and the average AMERICAN can go straight to the devil.

Since Indiana has had this law my life has been so much more enjoyable not having to answer the phone because of telemarketers call at all hours.

Thank you,
Dale L. Eggert